

Amanda Johnson

Adjunct Instructor • Marketing Strategist • Former NBC News Producer

Moore, SC | (917) 974-5399 | amanda@cupcakesandbroccoli.com | LinkedIn

TEACHING PHILOSOPHY

At the center of my teaching philosophy is a simple belief: in an age where information is abundant, judgment is becoming the most valuable skill students can develop. Whether students pursue careers in business, journalism, communications or entrepreneurship, they will be asked to solve complex problems, evaluate competing perspectives and make decisions that influence organizations and communities. My goal is to help them develop confidence and discernment to do so thoughtfully and ethically.

As artificial intelligence transforms every profession, students will have unprecedented access to information. They will be able to generate business plans, marketing campaigns, articles, presentations and competitive analyses in seconds. Information is becoming abundant. Discernment is becoming valuable. The professionals who thrive will not simply produce information more quickly. They will ask better questions, recognize meaningful patterns, verify information and exercise sound judgment before taking action.

That belief shapes how I teach. My classroom emphasizes discussion, current events, case studies and collaborative problem-solving rather than memorization. Drawing on experience in journalism, marketing, executive leadership and entrepreneurship, I help students connect theory with real-world practice while evaluating the opportunities and limitations of artificial intelligence. My goal is not simply to prepare students for their first job, but to help them become thoughtful decision-makers who lead with integrity, serve others well and use their judgment to make a positive impact in their organizations and communities.